Methylxanthines have been used for many years as first-line agents for the treatment of asthma and to prevent sudden cardiac death in patients with reduced left ventricular function. In addition, there is some experimental evidence that methylxanthines can improve defibrillation threshold. The purpose of this article is to review the potential role of oral methylxanthines in the management of patients undergoing ICD implantation. The authors reviewed the medical literature in the MEDLINE database from 1966 to August 2003 and conducted an extensive search of the relevant technical literature. Keywords for the review included the following: theophylline, depression, defibrillation threshold, ICD, and randomised trial. Methylxanthines were divided into two groups: (1) short-acting theophylline and (2) long-acting theophylline. The authors have focused on recent literature of the past year. Methylxanthines can depress the defibrillation threshold in man. Decreased sensitivity to electric stimulus in the heart may underlie this pharmacological activity. Intravenous methylxanthines are known to rapidly depress the defibrillation threshold, and in man have been shown to prolong the QT interval by an average of 30 ms. Systemic administration of methylxanthines may result in a more prolonged QT interval in patients with ICDs. There are conflicting data regarding whether long-acting methylxanthines can depress the defibrillation threshold. In conclusion, there is a clear and likely physiological role for theophylline as a potential adjunctive agent to be used in patients undergoing ICD implantation. There is a need for more large studies to confirm a clear role for these drugs. 631 So.2d 1341 (1994) Catherine Bracher, Appellant, v. Richard P. Br
